Suppliers ready for next gold rush

David Sedgwick
dsedgwick@crain.com

Global vehicle production may be leveling off for parts suppliers, but the fledgling market for self-driving cars is already morphing into their next gold rush.

In 2020, automakers are expected to produce 85.9 million vehicles equipped with collision avoidance systems, up from 10.8 million last year, according to a forecast by Gartner Research.

That's eye-popping growth in an industry that was beginning to think the decade's roaring business cycle was nearing its end.

And it explains why companies such as Bosch, Continental and Autoliv — the mega-suppliers that dominate the Automotive News list of the Top 100 Global Suppliers — are promoting their ability to integrate the necessary array of sensors, computer chips and software.

"Revenue is growing extremely fast," Mike Ramsey, a Detroit-based Gartner analyst, said of the emergence of autonomous technologies. And the new trend favors mega-suppliers "who are best positioned to take advantage."

That's because they enjoy economies of scale, deep pockets for product development, and have long-standing relationships with automakers, Ramsey said.

"If they don't deliver, the automakers can wring money out of them without putting them out of business," Ramsey noted. "The automakers feel a lot of security dealing with the big suppliers."

Economies of scale

Since r&d costs are considerable, the world's largest mega-suppliers hope to make the new technologies competitive by exploiting economies of scale.

Bosch, the top-ranked company on Automotive News' Top 100 Global Suppliers list, gener-

Top-ranked supplier Bosch will spend $336 million over the next five years to develop artificial intelligence for self-driving cars.

ates annual sales of more than 1 billion euros ($1.12 billion) for the sensors, software and actuators needed for collision avoidance and self-driving vehicles.

Now the company is upping the ante. In May, Bosch announced it will spend $336 million over the next five years to develop artificial intelligence for self-driving vehicles.

But even a behemoth such as Bosch is relying on newly formed partnerships to fill gaps in its menu of technologies, rather than rushing into the new world alone. In April, Bosch formed an alliance with Daimler AG to produce a fleet of driverless taxis. The company also has announced plans to manufacture vehicle processors with Silicon Valley's Nvidia, and it is working with digital map maker HERE to develop crowd-sourced road maps.

The task of designing self-driving vehicles "is too big for one company alone," said Kay Stepper, Bosch's vice president of automated driving. "We need the partnerships."

While Bosch is forming partnerships to gain access to key technologies, other companies are making acquisitions, and some of the deals have been blockbusters.

ZF Friedrichshafen — ranked No. 2 globally, with 2016 original-equipment sales of $38.5 billion — roiled competitors in 2014 with the $12.4 billion acquisition of TRW Automotive, a key producer of radar, cameras and brakes.

Last year, chipmaker Qualcomm Inc. disclosed a $38 billion bid for NXP Semiconductors, the auto industry's top supplier of semiconductors. And this year, Intel Corp. announced the $15.3 billion takeover of Mobileye N.V., the top producer of obstacle-detection software.

In all three cases, the bidders sought instant status in a key new technology. In this market, patience is not a virtue.

Large suppliers also have scrambled to acquire smaller companies — often Silicon Valley startups — to fill gaps in their technology portfolios.

In 2015, Delphi Automotive (No. 12, with $16.7 billion global sales) bought Ottomatika Inc., a Pittsburgh-based supplier of automated-driving software.

The same year, Delphi invested in Quanergy, a startup developing solid-state lidar. And in 2017, Delphi partnered with two Israeli firms and a German company that specialize in technology for cloud connectivity.

Delphi is marketing itself as a company that can integrate a customer's sensors, software and computer chips required for self-driving cars. Other companies are taking the same approach.

Agnostic software

Fully automated vehicles won't hit the market until next decade, but sales of their core technologies — such as radar, cameras and obstacle detection software — are booming already.

That has been a windfall for Autoliv Inc., the world's top airbag producer, and also a major supplier of radar and cameras. Autoliv's active safety electronics division reported sales of $740 million last year, up 17 percent from 2015. The company expects sales will continue to grow 15 percent annually through 2020.

That's a nice boost for Autoliv — which ranks 22nd with sales of $10.1 billion — because it is occurring at a time when the airbag market has matured through saturation.

The key to Autoliv's strategy is Zenuity, the company's newly formed joint venture with Volvo Car Corp. that will develop the decision-making software that allows self-driving cars to plot their course.

The partnership hopes to have its software production-ready in 2019, which means a customer could put it on the road in 2021.

Like Bosch, ZF, Delphi and others, Autoliv is positioning itself as a company that can manage the complex task of integrating sensors, software, actuators and computer chips.

Which is why Zenuity is so important. The goal is to design decision-making software that can be used with any supplier's sensors, actuators and control units — not just Autoliv's own hardware, said Johan Lofvenholm, president of Autoliv Electronics.

"Zenuity is a software-only venture," Lofvenholm said. "We have to make a system that is 'hardware agnostic,' so that we can make sure we have maximum versatility for customers."

To be sure, Autoliv and other mega-suppliers have made a big bet on a technology that is a decade from mass-market acceptance. But that doesn't bother Lofvenholm.

"Autonomous driving is the logical next step," he said. "That's how we are approaching this whole segment." AN
